TOTALLY NEW MOCK-UP

Wednesday, May 24, 2014 / No: 23.456

"It's always about the sauce.

Yes, you also need fresh mozzarella and a lightly-blistered crust, but it's the salsa di pomodoro that makes the pizza.

In my many years of pizza, there is no jar of crushed or diced tomatoes that compares. Perfetto!

There's Something About Italian Artisanship

Some call it pride. Passion. Obsession, even. To know Italy is to know that its essence lies in a resolute oneness, a fusion of man and his craft.

The Neapolitan pizzaiolo will tell you it is not he who makes the pizza, but it is the pizza that makes the man. Every lightly-blistered pie bears the traditions, secrets, and ancient pizza lore of Napoli.

To know Italy is to know the pursuit of perfection. A willingness to take your masterpiece, throw it away, and spend hours trying to top it. Because in the pursuit of perfection, there is no question whether it is necessary.

In Italy, patience is a virtue. That's true universally, from their dramatic architecture to their infamous political bureaucracy. But it's most apparent in their food. — By Erin Rossi

Modena: City of Fast Cars, Slow Food

"I drizzled the slow, syrupy balsamic over each of them. I thought about how this glaze took so many years to arrive here."

HEARTWORKS

As an American living in Italy, my endurance for the unhurried pace of life has sometimes been a jarring adjustment. Lunch might be convenient, but you'd never call it "fast". And yes, that's a good thing.

I'm a product of the convenience food generation, living in a slow-food nation. When I was a kid, you opened a box, pushed a button, and dinner was on the table. Here, meals are a long process of mingling sensory perceptions amid open-air markets, heavily gestured negotiations, carpal-tunnel levels of chopping, and then... there's the waiting. But that's what I love about this country. Every stage of an endeavor is painstakingly, respectfully, considered.

My neighbor saw me planting spring flowers the other day and came over to see what color they were. She asked so that she could plant her garden to complement mine.

We live high up in the rural countryside. No one is going to drive by and see our flowers. But, I realized that's not the point. It's harmony for the sake of beauty.

During the evening passeggiata, it's clear to see that the same desire to harmonize applies to wardrobe composition. I'm certain those outfits don't come together quickly, but they're always impeccable. This painstaking level of detail is really inconvenient if you're trying to get a driver's license in this country, but it's notably worthwhile when applied to food.

During a visit to Modena, I toured an acetaia where balsamic vinegar is made. The 3rd generation maker explained that after select grapes are reduced slowly, over an open flame, they spend several weeks fermenting. Then, the rich, dark liquid is transferred into a cask, the first of anywhere between 5-9 wooden barrels that they'll inhabit on the road to bottling. Every barrel is made with a different "flavor" of wood: chestnut, cherry, oak, mulberry, and juniper, among others. Once per year, a portion gets moved from one cask to the next, absorbing essences of changing wood and accumulating complexity as the years pass.

When I arrived at the final cask, there was a plate waiting. It contained a bright red strawberry, a freshly torn chunk of Parmigiano Reggiano, a small piece of bread with tiny diced tomatoes, and a demitasse of gelato. I drizzled the slow, syrupy balsamic over each of them. I thought about how this glaze took so many years to arrive here.

The juice from the strawberry lit up with sweetness as the acidity transformed the flavor into something otherworldly. It was like a chocolate covered strawberry, but with indescribable depth. The balsamic glaze soaked through only the surface of the bread, pooling around the meticulously diced tomatoes. Another explosion of flavor! This time like sweet, sticky molasses. The glaze calmed the saltiness of the cheese and left a palpable aftertaste of dried fig. To the gelato, it brought a bold, dark cherry-tinged creaminess. These flavors were a revelation. They were a physical manifestation of time, labor, and century-spanning tradition.

It's not everyday that I have the opportunity, or the time, to pause and taste with such vigor. But, every once in a while, the memory of that experience resurfaces. It reminds me to be more mindful. More patient. More involved in the exchange going on between my taste buds and my emotional responses. It's a reminder that there is joy in the waiting. There's value in the anticipation. With age, comes wisdom. Italy reinforces this adage every day, and with every bite. ✦

The Black Gold of Modena.

Balsamic glaze takes years to produce. It ages gently in private cellars, in barrels of oak, chestnut, and cherry wood. It's the sweet, complex flavor of time, tradition, and generations of dedication. In the land of fast cars and slow food, this black gold is worth its wait. Taste balsamico, taste Modena.

Tuscanini Baked Parchment Crackers Debut

Bayonne, NJ — Kosher food specialist Kayco is introducing Tuscanini Baked Parchment Crackers, paper-thin snacks imported for Sardinia, Italy, the company reports.

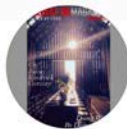

The OU Kosher baked items come in olive oil, olive oil rosemary and olive oil oregano, and are GMO free, made with five ingredients and have 120 calories per serving, according to Kayco. The crackers are made using re-milled durum wheat semolina, which is superior to other ground wheats and gives the products a unique flavor and crunch, according to Kimberly Cassar, vice-president of marketing.

"Consumers are looking for simple, yet sophisticated snack options," Cassar says. "We know that crackers are found in 77 percent of U.S. households, and the demand by consumers is trending toward thinner, more healthy, yet delicious crackers."

Coming in 3.5-ounce packs with a SRP of 2.99, they ship in 10-ct cases.
